GRAMMAR

The Focus of this Lesson is on Multiple Options (they're good!)

你同意也好，不同意也好，我已经报名参加托福考试了。

"You can agree or not, I've already enrolled to take the TOEFL exam"

Our grammar point for this lesson introduces the ...也好...也好 pattern. In our dialogue, we see this in the following sentence:

你同意也好，不同意也好，我已经报名参加托福考试了。

Nǐ tóngyì yě hǎo, bù tóngyì yě hǎo, wǒ yǐjīng bàomíng cānjiā tuōfú kǎoshì le.

"Whether you agree or not, I've already enrolled to take the TOEFL exam."

What the speaker is literally saying is that each of the two options presented is fine before making a statement about the choice itself.

Grammar Pattern:

Verb Phrase + 也好 + Verb Phrase + 也好,
Noun Phrase + 也好 + Noun Phrase + 也好,
Adjective Phrase + 也好 + Adjective Phrase + 也好.

There are two useful things to note about this grammar pattern. The first is the extreme flexibility of this grammar pattern. As you can see from the section above, the two options we present using this pattern can be courses of action (verbs), objects (nouns), or descriptions of implied people or objects. As long as both phrases use the same part of speech, our sentence will be grammatically correct.

The second and more subtle thing to note about this pattern is that we are not presenting two options so much as commenting on the situation that surrounds them. Consider the following sentence, which might be given by an employer seeking to hire a recent graduate:

研究生也好，本科生也好，无所谓。

Yánjiūshēng yě hǎo, běnkēshēng yě hǎo, wúsuǒwèi.

"A graduate student is fine, an undergraduate is fine too. I don't really care."

Or consider again the sentence:

出国也好，留在国内也好，我听你的。

Chūguó yě hǎo, liú zài guónèi yě hǎo, wǒ tīng nǐ de.

"I can either study abroad or stay at home, it's up to you."

In both of these cases, as with the sentence in our dialogue, this critical final clause colors our interpretation of the two choices and influences how we should understand them.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Studying Abroad for Chinese

For most Chinese students, being able to study abroad is a dream. Starting as soon as preschool, students engage in rigorous English studies in the hope that one day they will be able to study higher education abroad, and in return, find a high-paying job. One of the biggest determinants in being able to study abroad is an English proficiency exam. There are a couple of different exams that are given depending on where and what you want to study. One such test is the TOEFL (Test of English as a Foreign Language). This serves as an admissions requirement for many English-speaking universities. Another common proficiency test is IELTS (International English Language Testing System). Britain, Australia, and Canada sponsor this test. For most of these standardized tests, reading, writing, listening comprehension, and spoken modules are given. While students have ample experience in reading and writing, they still lag behind in oral and listening. This is largely due to the fact that there are few chances for students to practice spoken English with native English speakers. In most elementary and high schools, a non-native English speaker teaches English.

Comparing both the IELTS and TOEFL, some sources say that IELTS is relatively easier. The spoken portion of the IELTS test is given face to face with a real person, whereas the TOEFL test is proctored using a machine.

In China, many companies have set their business model to cater solely to the standardized English testing market. Companies such as New Oriental and Wall Street English are well-known for having well-developed English training methods. Along with large corporations, small start-up businesses have flooded the market. The demand for English testing education is extremely high in China. On average, students who want to study abroad will begin preparing for the exams one to two years beforehand.

GRAMMAR

The Focus of This Lesson is 不得了
你还要减肥? 你明明就瘦得不得了。

"You want to lose more weight? You're already really, really thin."

We use 不得了 (bùdéliǎo) to add emphasis to the adjective which precedes it. It is a curious beast. Consider the sentence 他高兴得不得了, tā gāoxìng de bùdéliǎo. ("He is very excited.") Grammatically, we use 不得了 as a complement for the adjective 高兴. Literally, our subject is excited to the extent of being 不得了 ("really"). This is a very colloquial grammar pattern. For another example, consider the common complaint that 我的工作多得不得了, wǒ de gōngzuò duō de bùdéliǎo. ("I've got a ton of work.") Literally, my work is so much that it is 不得了 ("really").

If you've come up through our progressive lesson series, this sentence structure will strike you as strange. For one, note the absence of any Chinese adverb of degree like 很 ("very") or 太 ("too") preceding our adjective. Instead, 不得了 seems to be playing the role of a verb complement, while our adjective has somehow morphed into a verb. But aren't verbs the only parts of speech that can take complements? In fact, in Chinese, all adjectives are technically verbs at heart. Depending on the textbook you use, you may have even run into them referred to by the term "stative verb." This insight gives us the key to understanding how to use 不得了.

Grammar Pattern:

Subject + Adjective + 得 + 不得了

Subject + Verb + 得 + 不得了

On a closing note, do not confuse the 不得了 grammar pattern we discussed above with the phrase 不得了了, bùdéliǎo le ("really awful"). You'll hear this expression from people when they're bemoaning something awful that has happened suddenly and unexpectedly. It is something you might hear people say, for instance, if they arrive home and find their house on fire. We can also use the term as a standalone verb, as with the sentence 他现在可不得了了, tā xiànzài kě bùdéliǎo le. ("He's really impressive.") In this sentence, our speaker is expressing disapproval of the subject, while also admitting that they have succeeded at something challenging. You could use this may to describe a corrupt official, for instance.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Thinking of Shedding Some Pounds in China?

Planning to lose weight in China? In an effort to help out, we conducted a casual survey of everyone in our office in order to find out the real Chinese dieting secrets you need to know to shed those last few pounds.

When we asked Nicole for her advice on how to lose weight, she suggested working while standing up. "If you sit at your keyboard all day," she mentioned, "you're not spending as much energy as if you're up and moving around." Nicole has put this dieting philosophy into practice, and is also the only person we know who recommends simply not eating. "You have to drink lots of water," she says, "but this isn't that unhealthy if you only do it for a week or so." On seeing the looks of horror on the faces of her colleagues, Nicole insists that dieting "is all about self-discipline!" If your diet isn't working, she recommends you just diet harder.

In contrast, Gail takes a more conventional approach, recommending everyone pick up an exercise routine. "Exercise is the most effective way to lose weight," she says, "and happens to be the healthiest too. And when you've finished dieting, exercise is the only way to keep the pounds off." Although she is particularly fond of Yoga, Gail also recommends swimming to fellow dieters. She adds that acupuncture sometimes works, but unreliably. And she disagrees strongly with Nicole's recommendation to simply not eat. "Don't do that," she insists. "Maybe you can get away with it for a day or two, but anything longer than that is harmful."

The rest our office was less helpful. Brendan did report hearing rumors of success for drinkers of dieting tea, known in China as 减肥茶, jiǎnféi chá ("weight-loss tea"). "This tastes awful," he claims, "but my girlfriend swears by it." Gail mentioned that she'd heard of the stuff, but was skeptical of its usefulness. "It takes off weight in all the wrong places," she points out. "If you're a woman, you'll lose weight everywhere you don't want to and keep it on everywhere else."

We've yet to hear of anyone succeeding through the skillful application of dieting tea, but if you're curious, you can always try asking for it by name.

GRAMMAR

The Focus of This Lesson is on Being Even-Handed

一方面，他很有礼貌. 另一方面....

"On the one hand, he's very polite. On the other hand...."

一方面...另一方面, ... yī fāngmiàn... lìng yī fāngmiàn ("on the one hand...on the other...") is a sentence pattern we use to connect two potentially unrelated observations and link them together in support of some observation, or even when equivocating between two choices. The basic pattern consists of 一方面 followed by the first clause (or point to be discussed), and then 另一方面 followed by the second clause (or point to be discussed). It's typical to omit the subject of the second clause, in which case it is understood to be the same as that of the first clause.

It is easiest to translate this into English literally using the phrase "on the one side...on the other." The only problem with this approach is that the Chinese pattern is slightly more flexible than its English counterpart would suggest. As you can see from the example sentences below, the two points we raise do not actually need to suggest alternating conclusions. Nor does use of this pattern suggest that someone is torn between two options. Our two points (or sides) can support the same conclusion! For example, "On the one side, he's rich; on the other, I love him. So let's get married!"

Sentence Pattern:

一方面 + (clause one) + 另一方面 + (clause two)

Sample Sentences

1. 一方面我不想去，另一方面我也没有时间
yīfāngmiàn wǒ bù xiǎng qù, lìngyīfāngmiàn wǒ yě méiyǒu shíjiān
"On the one hand, I don't want to go; on the other, I don't have the time either."
2. 一方面他很想去看，另一方面他又没有时间
yīfāngmiàn tā hěn xiǎng qù, lìngyīfāngmiàn tā yòu méiyǒu shíjiān
"On the one hand, he wants to go; but on the other, he doesn't have the time."
3. 这个问题一方面不好解决，另一方面解决了也没什么用
zhège wèntí yī fāngmiàn bù hǎo jiějué, lìng yī fāngmiàn jiějué le yě méi shénme yòng
"This question is not only difficult to resolve, but solving it isn't any use."
4. 这套衣服一方面不太好看，另一方面也太贵了
zhè tào yīfu yīfāngmiàn bù tài hǎokàn, lìng yī fāngmiàn yě tài guì le
"This suit of clothing is not very good looking, and also very expensive."

5. 他一方面不满意现在的生活，另一方面又不肯努力工作 tā yī fāngmiàn bù mǎnyì xiànzài de shēnghuó, lìng yī fāngmiàn yòu bù kěn nǔlì gōngzuò
"On the one hand, he isn't content with his current life, but then he's not willing to work hard either."

The Focus of This Lesson is On Ways to Say, "If" 要是它死了之后回来要我的命怎么办?
"What if it comes back to kill me after it's dead?"

The focus of our lesson today is reviewing a number of different ways to say "if." We've covered some of these in previous lessons, but have never brought them together into one place. So today, we do exactly that. As you may remember from previous lessons, the easiest and most intuitive way to structure an "if" sentence is by using the 如果...就..., rúguǒ... jiù... ("if...then...") pattern. This sentence pattern is quite close to its English counterpart. We begin our first clause with 如果 ("if"), and begin our second clause with 就 ("then").

In our dialogue, we see an abbreviated form of this pattern: two sentences that include 如果 but omit the 就. The first case of this is in the line 如果它死了怎么办, rúguǒ tā sǐ le zěnmē bàn ("What will we do if it dies?"). Another longer example might be 如果我能回答你的问题, 我一定会回答的, rúguǒ wǒ néng huídá nǐ de wèntí, wǒ yīdìng huì huídá de. ("If I can answer your question, I will definitely answer.") Note the way the conditional nature of the second clause is implied rather than stated outright. Another variant of this pattern that is quite common is including 的话 (de huà) at the end of the first conditional statement. An example is the sentence 如果你想解决问题的话, 去找他道歉, rúguǒ nǐ xiǎng jiějué wèntí dehuà, qù zhǎo tā dàoqiàn. ("If you want to solve the problem, go and apologize to him.")

Note: the subject for the second clause we assume to be the same as for the first clause unless we explicitly provide it.

The second most common way to structure an "if" sentence is with the word 要是 ("if"). We see this in the dialogue in the following line: 要是它死了之后回来要我的命怎么办, yàoshi tā sǐ le zhīhòu huílai yào wǒ de mìng zěnmē bàn ("What if it comes to kill me after it's dead?") 要是 can always replace 如果.

Sentence Pattern:

(subject) + 如果 + (clause one) + [的话] + [subject] + [就] + (clause two)
如果 + (subject) + (clause one) + [的话] + [subject] + [就] + (clause two)

(subject) + 要是 + (clause one) + [的话] + [subject] + [就] + (clause two) 要是 + (subject) + (clause one) + [的话] + [subject] + [就] + (clause two)

CULTURAL INSIGHT

A Fishy Experience in China

In China, it's common for restaurants to serve fish fresh. And we mean extremely fresh. Most restaurants in major cities that serve seafood will keep large tanks of fish inside lined up against one of the walls. This serves not only as decoration (and good luck, since fish are associated with money), but also serves to reassure patrons that their food is actually fresh.

Eating fish is very much a hands-on activity. If you order fish in a Chinese restaurant, don't be surprised if the waiter shows up with an actual live fish at your table shortly after you order. This serves two purposes. It lets you check the fish and reassures you that you're getting exactly what you've ordered. More importantly from the restaurant's perspective, it gives you the ability to confirm that you're happy ordering a fish that large. This is important since in most restaurants fish are priced by the kilogram. When the waiter comes to the table, just tell him 行, xíng ("it's okay"). And then sit back, and wait for your meal to arrive. And be careful to watch for the bones too.

GRAMMAR

The Focus of This Lesson is the Distance Past

结婚之前他总是带我去吃烛光晚餐...

"Before we got married, he'd always take me out for candlelight dinners...."

In Chinese, we often refer to the notion of tense as the "aspect" of a sentence. This is why we refer to the particles 了 (le), 过 (guo), and 着 (zhe) as "aspectual particles": they change our sense of when the events described took place. As we've learned in previous lessons, it's possible to change the aspect of a sentence without using aspectual particles however. In today's lesson, we're going to learn how to do this using the phrase 之前, zhīqián ("previously").

In our dialogue, we see this in the sentence 结婚之前他总是带我去吃烛光晚餐, jiéhūn zhīqián tā zǒngshì dài wǒ qù chī zhúguāng wǎncān. ("He always took me out for candlelight dinners before we got married.") This sentence follows typical Chinese word order. Our clause indicating time is 结婚之前, jiéhūn zhīqián ("before marriage"). We place this at the beginning of our sentence either preceding or following the subject. Note that we can swap out this time phrase and insert another and our sentence will still make sense. Consider, for example, the sentence 1982年他总是带我去吃烛光晚餐, yījiǔbāèr nián tā zǒngshì dài wǒ qù chī zhúguāng wǎncān. ("He often took me out to candlelight dinners in 1982.")

Now that we understand exactly what is happening, let us take a closer look at 之前 ("before"). As you may already know, 之 (zhī) is a classical character that carries the same meaning as 它 (it). And as you should already know, 前 (qián) means "before." So, 之前 is a noun phrase which means "the time before it." "It," in this case, refers to the verb action, which immediately precedes it. This is a relatively formal way of expressing yourself. In spoken Chinese, people will often prefer to use 以前 (yǐqián) instead.

Sample Sentences

1. 来中国之前, 我说汉语有困难。
lái zhōngguó zhīqián, wǒ shuō hànǔ yǒu kùnnan.
"Before I went to China, I had trouble speaking Chinese."

2. 离婚之后，他不再出去见朋友了。
lǐhūn zhīhòu, tā bùzài chūqù jiàn péngyou le.
"After he got divorced, he stopped going out and seeing friends."
3. 告诉他重要的事情之前，一定要让他签保密合同。
gàosu tā zhòngyào de shìqing zhīqián, yīdìng yào ràng tā qiān bǎomì hé tong.
"Before you tell him anything important, be sure to get him to sign a non-disclosure agreement."
4. 大学毕业之后，他过了好几年才找到一份好工作。
dàxué bìyè zhīhòu, tā guò le hǎo jǐ nián cái zhǎodào yī fèn hǎo gōngzuò.
"After graduating from college, he drifted around for a few years before finding a good job."

CULTURAL INSIGHT

The Chinese Divorce Rate Skyrockets!

Although divorce hasn't been common in China in the past, statistics show that the phenomenon is catching on. In 2009, the divorce rate in China was three times its rate in 2001. Beijing leads all other major Chinese cities with a divorce rate of thirty-nine percent, with Shanghai, Shenzhen, Guangzhou, Xiamen, and Dalian trailing not far behind with divorce rates of over thirty-one percent. These figures, which come from the Chinese Ministry of Civil Affairs, show that divorce is now five times more prevalent in China than it was at the beginning of the reform and opening up movement in the late 1970s, and three times more prevalent than it was at the beginning of the decade.

Why the change? From the outside, it's hard to tell if the increasing divorce rate is a temporary or permanent trend. Skeptics suggest the rise may be temporary as embittered older couples finally take advantage of their ability to divorce do so. And it is true that as China has modernized, the social stigma attached to divorce has lessened. But pressures forcing many younger Chinese into quick marriages have not lessened, suggesting the rise in divorce rates won't abate anytime soon. Parents and older relatives continue to place enormous pressure on young couples to find partners and marry at a relatively young age. University graduates will often marry in their early twenties, and very often to school sweethearts.

All that being said, divorce rates in China are still significantly less than those in North America and Europe. So if you're planning to tie the knot in China, don't let us dissuade you.

GRAMMAR

The Focus of This Lesson is zhihou ("after" or "afterwards")

就是在你加了番茄酱之后

"Just after you add the tomato sauce"

In our last lesson, we learned how to use 前 (qián) and 之前 (zhīqián) to put our sentences in the past tense without using the aspectual particles 了 (le), 着 (zhe) or 过 (guo). We did this by placing 之前 at the beginning of our sentence immediately after a headless verb phrase. This pattern suggests that the rest of our action happened before the verb phrase. An example was the sentence 结婚之前他总是带我去吃烛光晚餐 jiéhūn zhīqián tā zǒngshì dài wǒ qù chī zhúguāng wǎncān ("Before getting married, he always took me out for candlelight dinners").

In today's lesson we focus on the similar phrase 之后 ("afterwards"). As you should remember from our previous lesson, 之 (zhī) is a classical character that carries the same meaning as 它 (it). 之后 is therefore a noun phrase which means "the time after it." And our usage of 之后 is identical to the way we use 之前. The keen student may have noticed something different about the example sentences in our dialogues from this week. Specifically, all them precede their verb headphrase with the character 在 zài ("to be at").

Why does 在 appear in our sentences for this week but not in the ones we gave you last week? The answer is actually a matter of choice. In colloquial Chinese it is common to omit the 在. You may choose to use it or not depending on your preferences.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Chinese Grocery Stores

Sugar, salt, and vinegar? Count your blessings that we keep it simple. If you've ever been in a grocery store in China, you'll have seen row after row of powders, spices, and sauces: the names of which leave the tongues of even the most fluent Sinologists in a state of perpetual shock. When set against such exotic condiments as oyster-flavored sesame oil or the profusion of soy sauces on the market, the Western preference for vinegar, sugar, and tomato sauce seems simple in comparison.

Why do Chinese cooks rely on such an exotic variety of spices and sauces, and why haven't more traditional Western foods caught on? Two simple explanations spring to mind. The first is that unlike in the United States, most grocery stores in China don't have extensive freezer sections, and what space they do have for frozen goods is often reserved for food items like frozen dumplings and other Chinese staples. So families are much more used to cooking from scratch and actually use these exotic spices. The second reason is that canned goods are also surprisingly rare. It's a mystery to us as to why these aren't more popular, but many Chinese shoppers have never seen (let alone used) can openers. The tops to most canned goods in China come with peel-off lids.

For lovers of spices and non-perishable sauces, a Chinese supermarket is a thing of beauty. So take a walk down the aisles the next time you're in one and see what you can find!

GRAMMAR

The Focus of This Lesson is On Passing the Buck....

根据我们村子里的传统，还得送一辆汽车。

"According to our village traditions, you also need to give a car."

Our grammar section today focuses on how to attribute statements or beliefs to third parties, or explain your grounds for holding certain opinions. In Chinese, this is most commonly done using the word 根据 (gēnjù). This is a very common word you'll see again and again especially in Chinese newspapers. There are several points about its usage that are worth mention.

In our podcast, we run into 根据 in its most common form as a preposition or co-verb. In particular, this preposition is used most frequently as a prepositional clause that opens a sentence. If you're unfamiliar with these clauses, you can see how they front-end sentences as in our dialogue with the sentence 根据我们村子里的传统，还得送一辆汽车 gēnjù wǒmen cūnzi lǐ de chuántǒng, hái dé sòng yī liàng qìchē ("According to our village traditions, you also need to give me a car"). To see how this is actually a preposition, note that we could re-write this sentence more explicitly as 娶我的时候，你根据中国传统得送彩礼。 ("When you marry me you must give me a gift according to Chinese tradition"). Front-ending prepositional clauses is common in Chinese, and this is the dominant way you will see 根据 used. For another example, consider the sentence we offered in our podcast: 根据气象台最新消息，今天晚上最低气温为2摄氏度 gēnjù qìxiàngtái zuì xīn xiāoxī, jīntiān wǎnshàng zuì dī qìwēn wéi èr shèshìdù ("According to the latest information from the weather station, the temperature tonight will drop to 2 degrees Celcius").

Moving on, while the dominant usage of 根据 is as a preposition, you will sometimes see this word being used as a noun. In this case it refers to the basis of the belief, or the grounds for holding an opinion. Two examples of this are the sentence 说话要有根据 shuōhuà yàoyǒu gēnjù ("When you say something, you should have a basis for saying it."), and 你的根据是什么 nǐ de gēnjù shì shénme ("What are your grounds?"). You will also see 根据 used as a verb on occasion, as with the sentences 买东西要根据需要 mǎi dōngxi yào gēnjù xūyào ("You should buy according to your needs."), and 娶我必须根据中国的传统 qǔ wǒ bìxū gēnjù Zhōngguó de chuántǒng ("You must marry me according to Chinese traditions"), the part of speech of this word in Chinese is quite different from the way you would usually translate it into English.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Chinese Wedding Traditions

In the past, arranged marriages were typical in China, and the day of their marriage would often be the first day the bride and groom would meet each other. While young couples are of course much more free to choose their own partners today, and this has simplified marriage rituals significantly, there are still some customs that are common in China that involve gift-giving and marriage.

Although this is not common in much of urban China, in rural parts of the country it is still common for the parents of both bride and groom to meet before the ceremony to agree to the marriage. In this ritual, the parents of the groom are expected to visit the bride's house and present her parents with the gift of a rooster and hen, each of which should be bright red. The acceptance of the gift signifies the acceptance of the family bond, and the marriage date is set. In some parts of China, it has also been traditional for the groom to present the bride's parents with a large sum of money as a dowry. This is less common these days, although many parents will expect their daughter's suitors to be able to provide a house after the couple gets married.

Exchanges of money and other gifts are still a major part of most weddings though. One of the most interesting customs surrounding a Chinese wedding is the red envelope. Two days before the wedding, most couples will need to head to the bank and get a lot of small change. They will typically convert ten, one hundred RMB notes into one thousand, one RMB notes, or five hundred RMB in bills into one thousand 0.5 RMB notes or five thousand 0.1 RMB notes. These small paper bills are then painstakingly stuffed into red envelopes, which are then distributed to guests at the wedding ceremony. Just this bill-stuffing work can take hours to prepare.

Typically, this money (and much more) will flow back to the couple at their wedding banquet following the ceremony. If you are invited to a wedding banquet, you will be expected to give a gift of cash to the new couple. In most cases, a gift of several hundred renminbi will be sufficient. The obligation to give more of course depends on how close you are to the couple. Giving too much is as potentially embarrassing as giving too little. If you're uncertain how much is suitable, your best guide is asking a third party.

GRAMMAR

The Focus of This Lesson is on the 也好。。。也罢 Construction

股票也好，债券也罢，反正都是要亏钱的。

"Stocks are okay and bonds are okay too. You're going to lose money anyway."

Have you ever been faced with a choice and been indifferent to your options? In today's intermediate lesson, we learn how to communicate this type of indifference in Chinese by using the 也好... 也罢... (yě hǎo... yě bà...) structure. We use this grammar pattern to suggest that either of two choices is acceptable. In the dialogue, we saw this in the sentence 股票也好，债券也罢，反正都是要亏钱的. ("Stocks are fine and bonds are fine too; you'll lose money either way.")

We use the 也好... 也罢... construction only when the speaker is genuinely indifferent between the two choices. It also suggests that the speaker doesn't consider either of the options particularly attractive, so if you are torn between two great options, this is not the pattern to use. Chinese speakers will typically add closing commentary to this structure as in the dialogue, tagging on a final remark that reinforces their indifference like 我管不着, wǒ guǎn bù zháo ("I don't care."), or 它们都可以, tāmen dōu kěyǐ. ("They're both okay.")

Grammar Structure:

(Option #1) + 也好 + (Option #2) + 也罢 + (Optional Closing Phrase)

Sample Sentences

1. 挣钱也好，亏欠也罢，他都不关心。
Zhèng qián yě hǎo, kuī qiàn yě bà, tā dōu bù guānxīn.
"He doesn't care whether he makes money or loses it."
2. 你去也好，不去也罢，我管不着。
Nǐ qù yě hǎo, bù qù yě bà, wǒ guǎn bù zháo.
"I don't care if he goes or not."
3. 这些钱你买衣服也好，买吃的也罢，都随你的便。
Zhè xiē qián nǐ mǎi yīfu yě hǎo, mǎi chīde yě bà, dōu suí nǐ de biàn.
"Do whatever you want with this money, buy clothes or food."

Language Tip

A common variant on this pattern is the 也好... 也好... structure. We use this exactly the same way, but it doesn't carry the same negative emotional tone. Use it when you are pleased with both of the options but still indifferent between them.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Chinese Investors and Investments

Investors who look at China from abroad are often astonished at the state of Chinese markets. While the economy here has continued to grow quite steadily, the behavior of investors in both the stock and real estate markets seems positively foolish when considered through the lens of historic bubbles and crashes. It isn't hard to see the prevalence of irrational expectations of growth and highly volatile behavior.

While there are a few explanations offered for this, the most convincing one is that without the ability to freely convert renminbi into foreign assets, domestic investors have few options for investments other than real estate and stocks. Speculation is rampant, and the fact that publicly traded companies tend to own both real estate and holdings in each other feeds into virtuous and vicious cycles. When the price of housing rises, the capitalization of publicly traded companies rises as the value of their assets increases-further boosting stock prices. The system is highly leveraged, which is why small panics abroad often spark much larger drops in the value of Chinese markets.

Not surprisingly, the Chinese government is often quick to step in to shore up unsustainable values. Somewhat perversely, policies justified as fighting speculation in both markets often do nothing more than reduce the supply of assets available. And so, it isn't surprising that many families in this environment invest their money in human capital instead: educating their children at a good university or sending them abroad to master a foreign language.

GRAMMAR

The Focus of This Lesson is a New Way to Ask Questions

首付还可以优惠点儿不？

"Can we get a break on the down payment?"

In our Absolute Beginner and Elementary series, we taught you three basic techniques for asking questions:

1. Use question words like 什么, shénme ("what") or 谁, shéi ("who")
2. Add the 吗 (ma) particle to the end of any statement
3. Reduplicate our main verb in both the positive and negative form as with 是不是, shì bu shì ("to be or not") or 有没有, yǒu méiyǒu ("to have or not")

All of these ways of asking questions are relatively straightforward. You can use them in formal Chinese writing or casual Chinese speech. In today's lesson, we're going to focus on a very colloquial way to ask questions and talk a bit about the emotional undertones we see in this new method of asking questions. Let's start by looking at the following sentences:

1. 你想出去吃饭不？
Nǐ xiǎng chūqù chīfàn bù?
"You want to go out and eat, right?"

2. 明天他有时间不？

Míngtiān tā yǒu shíjiān bù?

"He has some free time tomorrow, right?"

3. 放款需要一次付清不？

Fàngkuǎn xūyào yī cì fùqīng bù?

"This loan needs to be paid off in one sum, is that right?"

Grammatically, what we have is a standard question, which would otherwise end with 吗, but ends with 不 instead. This is a very casual way of asking a question, the meaning of which is almost identical to what happens when we end an English sentence with "right" or "is that right?" This is an emotional way to express a kind of hope or (sometimes resigned) expectation that the answer to your question will be "yes." Pretty easy to understand, right? Good. Then we can take a look at how this structure works in the past tense now.

For Example:

1. 他的工作完成了没？

Tā de gōngzuò wánchéng le méi?

"His work is finished, right?"

2. 你的贷款还完了没？

Nǐ de dàikuǎn hái wán le méi?

"You've fully paid off your mortgage, right?"

3. 事情做好了没？

Shìqing zuò hǎo le méi?

"The matter has been attended to successfully, correct?"

All we are doing is swapping out 吗 and swapping in 没. Pay attention to the way these sentences do not eliminate the penultimate 了 particle. When native Chinese speakers are speaking extremely casually though, they'll often drop this closing (le). We recommend you get in the habit of leaving the 了 particle in, but if you ever want to impress, try dropping the 了 when speaking with a close friend in an informal situation. They'll be impressed.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Property Bubble in China?

In cities across China such as Beijing, Shanghai, Guangzhou, and Shenzhen, the housing market can be described as "Red Hot." Due to China's economic success, many people, and the Chinese government, are flush with cash. But for most investors, the available financial investment options are still limited to the stock market and securities, which come with a high level of risk. The safest place for most Chinese to invest their money is in property. Currently, the housing industry accounts for ten percent of China's economy.

Since the enactment of the stimulus package in China, banks have been flush with cash, offering low interest rates on loans. Bank loans in China went from 422.3 billion yuan in 2008 to 2.46 trillion yuan in 2009. This easy money has resulted in a buying frenzy where potential home investors will purchase multiple units at one time. For many new projects, most of the apartments still lay empty. The occupancy rate is shockingly low.

To restrict overheating in the housing market, the government has instituted new rules preventing a catastrophic bubble implosion. New rules such as higher down payments for second-hand homes and interest discounts for first time-home buyers have also been abolished. These policies along with others may be enough to put the housing market on stable footing, but the jury is still out.

GRAMMAR

The Focus of This Lesson is 'Everything'

对啊，所有人都说她长得很精致。

"That's right. Everyone says she's becoming very beautiful."

Today we want to focus on a small but tricky word in Chinese: 所有 (suǒyǒu). Before we break into the usage of this word, let's spend a moment looking into its etymology. In traditional Chinese, the character 所 is often used to refer to a place or location. We still see this usage today in words like 派出所 pàichūsuǒ ("police station") and 厕所 cèsuǒ ("toilet"). The meaning of 有 is, of course, "to have," which is where the original meaning of this compound comes from. We use it to refer to "everything" in the sense of "all that is there."

In our dialogue, we heard 所有人 ("everyone"). In this case, we can see 所有 functioning as an adjective. Simply place it before any noun, as with 所有东西 ("all of the things"), or in front of nominalized verb phrases as in the example 所有能做的 ("everything that can be done"). These compound phrases can be used anywhere in a sentence that a regular noun can go.

The tricky thing about this to many intermediate students is that it is easy to confuse 所有 with 所有的. There is a difference though. When used as an adjective, 所有的 and 所有 are completely interchangeable. You will therefore hear people refer to 所有人 as well as 所有的人. In a few cases, 所有 can function as a noun. And in this situation it cannot be replaced by 所有的. Examples of this second usage in the podcast included the sentence 一夜之间，他就失去了所有 yī yè zhījiān, tā jiù shīqù le suǒyǒu ("He lost it all in a single evening").

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Prejudices in China

Chinese people are often uncommonly direct in sharing their opinions and prejudices, especially when commenting on the personal appearance or habits of foreigners. Once you're in China, don't be surprised to receive comments that are uninvited, occasionally unflattering, and even simply bizarre. This behavior is especially common once you get out of the major cities and into parts of China where foreigners seldom tread.

One of the causes of this behavior is that Chinese people often share somewhat prejudicial opinions on what constitutes an attractive weight or skin tone, and even have preferences for very minor features such as whether people have double- or single-lipped eyelids (double-lipped are strongly preferred - cosmetic surgery is a booming business). These opinions are often reinforced by a media that sells everything from cosmetic surgery to skin whitening (read: bleaching) creams. So prepare to be offended. There are few reservations or topics that are off limits so don't be surprised if your taxi driver asks you how much you make a month, or if the auntie next door evaluates your recent haircut out loud to the whole neighborhood. Just remember that patience is a virtue.

GRAMMAR

The Focus of this Lesson is on Doubles and Multiples

我舅舅上个月花一百万买了一栋房子，这个月就涨了一倍！

"My uncle spent a million last month buying a house. It's already doubled in value this month."

Our grammar focus today is about doubles and multiples. In our dialogue, we see an example of this in the following sentence:

我舅舅上个月花一百万买了一栋房子，这个月就涨了一倍

Wǒ jiùjiu shàng ge yuè huā yībǎiwàn mǎi le yī dòng fángzi, zhèigè yuè jiù zhǎng le yī bèi

"My uncle spent a million last month buying a house. It's already doubled in value."

Our key section here is the passage 涨了一倍 (zhǎng le yī bèi), which literally translates as, "to increase by the original amount." This is the most common way to express the idea of increasing a numbers by multiples of itself. And although 一倍 is most common, you will also see reference to other multiples, such as 两倍 (liǎng bèi), 三倍 (sān bèi), or 几倍 (jǐ bèi). These are commonly combined with the verbs 涨, zhǎng ("to increase"), 加, jiā ("to add"), and 翻, fān ("to flip over"). The meaning of most of these combinations is fairly obvious. 涨一倍 means "to double," or "to increase the total amount by an amount equal to the original." Likewise, 加了三倍 means "to add on three extra amounts equal to the original amount," or "quadruple the original amount."

Chinese is ambiguous when it comes to the verb 翻, however. The reason for this is that this verb can, but does not necessarily carry the connotation of compound growth. This makes it unclear in practice whether 翻了两倍 means "to double," or "to triple," or "to quadruple." So use this verb with caution when you need to be precise with your figures and don't be afraid to ask for clarification if someone else uses the phrase.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Chinese Real Estate

Property values are rising rapidly in many developed Chinese cities, citing many observers to speculate that China is in the middle of a massive real estate bubble. While it is unclear how much of the recent increase in house prices is sustainable, there have been several factors driving the massive increases over the past few years. One of the most important is the lack of any property tax, which makes real estate one of the more stable investments available to wealthy individuals and businesses in Asia. While the Chinese government is considering adopting a property tax, it is likely to look something like a tax on real estate transactions rather than an annual tax on assets under ownership.

Other critical factors include the government dependence on land sales for local revenues. This not only encourages governments to promote development, but also encourages a raft of soft policies designed to prop up the price of housing and the real estate market. Among these are policies that promote real estate development. These include low-interest loans to developers, compulsory funds-matching programs for businesses employing staff, and more. As a result, while it is not clear how much more prices can reasonably increase, it seems unlikely that the Chinese real estate market will face a serious crash.

GRAMMAR

The Focus of This Lesson is De-emphasizing Something in Chinese

为什么？不过是个打火机罢了。

"Why? It's only a lighter, that's all."

Today we want to emphasize a common way of downplaying something. This is the 不过...罢了 (bùguò ... bà le) pattern: a light, dismissive way to state that something is not important. The pattern literally translates as "merely... that's all," and we run into it two or three times in our dialogue, depending on how you count.

For Example:

1. 为什么？不过是个打火机罢了。
Wèishénme? Bùguò shì ge dǎhuǒjī bà le.
"Why? It's only a lighter, that's all."
2. 怕什么？不过是聊聊罢了。
Pà shénme? Bùguò shì liáoliao bà le.
"What are you afraid of? It's only a little chat, that's all."
3. 土制炸弹罢了。
Tǔzhì zhàdàn bà le.
"Just a homemade bomb."

As you can see, the pattern itself is extremely simple. Start your sentence with the conjunction 不过 (bùguò) and then add 罢了 (bà le) at the end of the sentence. You'll hear this most frequently paired with the verb 是 ("to be"), but we can in fact use it with any verb. As our last sample sentence shows, however, you can selectively omit 不过 and even the leading verb. In this case, we imply the verb 是, as with our example 土制炸弹罢了, Tǔzhì zhàdàn bà le. ("It's just a homemade bomb").

On a final note, be aware that you can also omit 罢了, as with the sentence 他不过是个小孩儿 tā búguò shì ge xiǎoháir. ("He's only a small child.") The meaning of this sentence is identical to what it would be if it ended with 罢了. This version is somewhat less colloquial though, and not nearly as dismissive.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Not So Funny Security Checks

Don't joke around with airport security staff—even in a second language. That said, passing through airport security in China is not usually as tiresome as it can be in the United States. In major cities like Beijing and Shanghai, security checks are still relatively strict, although we've yet to have to take off our shoes. If you are hoping to avoid security checks by taking the train, you'll be disappointed. In both Shanghai and Beijing, the major train stations now scan all luggage. And subway stations are starting the practice as well.

GRAMMAR

The Focus of This Lesson is the Passive Voice

老婆，我的电子邮箱被盗了！

lǎopo, wǒ de diànzǐ yóuxiāng bèi dào le!

"Honey, my e-mail account was hacked!"

As we have learned in previous lessons, the passive voice is a type of sentence that makes the object (the receiver of the action) the subject of the sentence. For example, the English sentence "He hurt me" in passive voice would be "I was hurt by him." A simple Chinese sentence of this sort would be the sentence 我被他打了, wǒ bèi tā dǎ le. ("I was hit by him.") Note that the word order in this sentence is different from English. A literal translation would read "I by him to be hit."

While we have covered simple passive sentences in previous lessons, in this lesson we see two that are more complex. The first is the use of a more complex noun phrase in place of a pronoun or person. These types of complex sentences are very typical. The second interesting thing about our passive sentences in this lesson is that they omit the agent completely. In our dialogue, we hear that 我的电子邮箱被盗了, wǒ de diànzǐ yóuxiāng bèi dào le. ("My e-mail box has been hacked.") As in English, this sentence omits the doer of the action. In Chinese, we accomplish this by following 被 (bèi) directly with the main verb of the sentence.

This form of the passive is heavily contextual. Its meaning is understood largely through context or through common sense. For example, the sentence 包裹已经寄了 (bāoguǒ yǐjīng jì le) should be interpreted as "The package has already been sent" and not as "The package already sent [itself]" since the latter interpretation is nonsensical. In some situations, you will run into sentences with multiple possible interpretations and will need to rely on the context to decide if the voice of the sentence is passive or active.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

China may seem like a police state at first glance, but it really isn't when you look closer. Because many residential compounds and companies have to rely on themselves to ensure security, many compounds will post security guards at their gates. These security guards all dress alike with wide-brimmed military hats, gray slacks, and short-sleeved button-up shirts in the summer. They usually wear simple shoes stitched together with thin padding entirely made from cloth. It is not uncommon for security guards to drill in unison, marching up and down the street like soldiers on parade. But do not be fooled. These guards are not affiliated with the military or the police. They cannot arrest you.

Although many guards range in age from around eighteen years old to well past fifty years old, the majority are young men from the countryside. They aren't usually very busy and make for good conversation partners. We know of several quite fluent foreigners who have reported using them as conversation partners on arrival in China. One way to make a good impression is to offer a cigarette, and start a bit of small talk the next time you see them. Given that these sentries control the entryways to places you're likely to be, you'll be surprised at how effective this is at getting better service and preventing your visitors from being harassed on their way in.

GRAMMAR

The Focus of This Lesson is Advanced Ways of Asking Questions

你体力如何？

"How is your physical condition?"

Our focus in today's grammar point is the question word 如何, rúhé ("How is it?") This is a relatively advanced way of asking a question in Chinese. We use it to ask "How about...(a noun or verb phrase which precedes it)." We encountered it in our dialogue when the guidance counselor asked the student 你体力如何, nǐ tǐlì rúhé? ("How is your physical condition?")

Consider the following sample sentences as well:

1. 你打球的技术如何？
Nǐ dǎqiú de jìshù rúhé?
"How are you at playing this game?"
2. 你的体力如何？爬这么高的山没有问题吧！
Nǐ de tǐlì rúhé? Pá zhème gāo de shān méiyǒu wèntí ba!
"How is your health? Climbing this mountain isn't a problem, right?"
3. 你觉得她的英语如何？
Nǐ juéde tā de yīngyǔ rúhé?
"What do you think of her English?"

There are a few interesting things to note in these sentences. The first is the word order, with placing 如何 last. This makes 如何 the grammatical equivalent of 怎么样, zěnmeyàng? ("How about it?") The difference between the two phrases is basically one of formality: 如何 is somewhat formal while 怎么样 is very casual. Our guidance counselor uses the formal expression here because it is her job. So be aware that if you use this phrase in relatively colloquial and informal settings with closer friends, it may come off as somewhat awkward. Conversely, used properly, this question word will mark you as an expert Mandarin-speaker.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Landing a Job in China

For recent college graduates the current job market is tough. Many college students secure internships at the end of their third year in college. Their fourth year is spent mostly out of the classroom and in the office of whichever company hires them. This is not usually a terribly formalized process, but it is the norm in many universities, especially for non-technical majors. As a result, finding a secure job puts a lot of stress on the backs of most college students and especially those without the connections or money to find positions in the private sector.

In 1995, the Chinese government instituted what it called Project 211. This was an initiative to build one hundred and six key universities, aiming to cultivate a high-level elite for national economic and social development. One consequence of this has been a windfall in university funding, along with skyrocketing rates of student enrollment, and the expansion of higher education nationwide. While more students are receiving tertiary education, the job market has not kept pace for graduates with post-secondary experience.

This had led to a crisis of sorts for recent graduates. Many graduates coming from midlevel universities are finding themselves having to settle for more menial and lower-paying jobs. Some parents are even taking active roles in helping their children find employment. It has been reported that some overbearing parents have taken to accompanying their children to job fairs. This has had the obvious effect of deterring potential employers.

不是...而是...(bù shì... érshì...) is a pattern that emphasizes the contrast between two words, phrases, or clauses. We can translate it into English as "not... but..." or "not... rather..." This is a relatively formal way of communicating, but we can still use it in common speech. There are two things to notice about it. The first is that our twin clauses must be balanced: they must consist of the same part of speech and be interchangeable. The simplest sentences of this sort work with two nouns, in which case, 是 functions as our main verb. As the examples below make clear, we can use this pattern in more complex sentences with contrasted verb clauses.

Formation

不是 + (Sentence) + 而是 + (Sentence)

Wǒmen xué de bù shì Xībānyáyǔ, érshì Zhōngwén.

"What we're studying isn't Spanish, but Chinese."

2. 我不是不愿意帮你的忙，而是没有钱。

Wǒ bù shì bùyuànyì bāng nǐ de máng, érshì méiyǒu qián.

"It's not that I don't want to help you, it's that I don't have the money."

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Chinese Recent History Lesson

Despite the frequent complaints you'll read in the Chinese media about the selectivity of Japanese history textbooks, it is hard not to feel that the pot is calling the kettle black on that count. Chinese students are typically brought up with a very nationalist view of modern history. Chinese history prior to 1949 is typically taught through an explicit Leninist perspective that is sharply critical of all foreign activities in China. Historical coverage of post-revolution China also tends to adhere quite closely to party doctrine.

That said, in recent years there has been a clear loosening of control over history. In part, this has happened because education is delegated to provincial ministries, which hand off responsibility for local schools to municipalities. This gives teachers significant leeway to craft their own lessons, which can be surprisingly critical of mainstream CCP doctrine. Consider the case of Yuan Tengfei, a middle-school teacher in Beijing who became famous when a series of video recordings of his lectures were posted to the Internet. Teng's acrid comments about Mao Zedong and the Cultural Revolution made the teacher a minor celebrity. And as his online popularity grew, Teng was invited to appear on CCTV's Lecture Room, a television program usually reserved for prominent professors and established scholars. He also got a book deal.

GRAMMAR

The Focus of This Lesson is the Adverb 白

三字經都白背了，書都白念了。

Sān zì jīng dōu bái bèi le, shū dōu bái niàn le.

"It's all been wasted, memorizing the classics and reading all those books."

Our grammar focus today is how to say that something is "done in vain." In Chinese, we accomplish this with the adverb 白 ("in vain"). This is the same 白 as in the color white. You can see its use as an adverb in our dialogue for this lesson when our Chinese parent says 三字經都白背了，書都白念了. ("It's all been wasted, memorizing the classics and reading all those books.")

For Example:

1. 我都白去了，谈判没有成功。
Wǒ dōu bái qùle, tánpàn méiyǒu chénggōng.
"I went for nothing: the talks didn't succeed."
2. 白说了，我说服不了了。
Bái shuōle, wǒ shuōfú bùliǎo le.
"It's no use: I can't convince him."

We can place 白 before any verb, although we most commonly pair it with common, single-character verbs. You will hear people say they do not want to 白去 ("to go in vain") or 白来 ("to come in vain"). If you are unable to convince someone of something, you can also refer to that as 白说 ("to speak in vain"). And for extra emphasis, be sure to add the adverb 都 prior to the adverb 白. This reinforces suggestions that the activity was "entirely" or "totally" a failure.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Chinese One-Child Policy

The one-child policy was established in China under Deng Xiaoping in 1979 to keep population growth to a sustainable level. Although originally designated as a "temporary measure," the policy has continued unabated since its creation. Although unevenly enforced in rural parts of the country, the one-child policy has also been successful in its aims of curtailing population growth. There are no plans to rescind it: the Director of China's National Family Planning and Population Commission has recently stated the policy will remain in force at least through 2015 and likely longer.

Since Chinese families have traditionally been quite large, the one-child policy has also ushered in a significant change in family dynamics. Although China has always been a Confucian society that has placed a great value on filial piety, it is difficult for many children to conform to and fulfill the heightened parental expectations that come with being an only child. At the same time, without the financial burden of raising multiple children, many Chinese parents are placing higher expectations on their single child. This has driven enormous growth in the Chinese education industry started in the 1990s and created a rapid increase in the number of Chinese students sent abroad.

Pu Shu's latest album is called "Life Like Summer Flowers".

GRAMMAR

The Focus of this Lesson is a Classical Turn of Phrase

家有阿姨，如有洁癖。

jiā yǒu āyí, rú yǒu jié pǐ.

"Having a maid is about the same."

In previous lessons we encountered the character 如 as part of the conjunction 如果 rúguǒ ("if"). In that situation the character meant "if" as in the sentence 如果有问题，随时给我打电话 rúguǒ yǒu wèntí, suíshí gěi wǒ dǎ diànhuà ("If there's a problem, give me a call anytime."). In our dialogue however, we see this character used in a different and much more difficult way in the sentence 家有阿姨，如有洁癖 jiā yǒu āyí, rú yǒu jié pǐ ("Having a maid is the same as being obsessive about cleanliness").

This second type of usage is confusing for many students for two reasons. The first is that the character 如 is quite close to its usage in classical Chinese. The meaning of the character 如 is not technically "if" but rather "much like". It means almost exactly the same thing as 好像 and can usually be replaced by that word. The second reason for the confusion is that 如 is a more formal expression and tends to appear in more challenging sentences which depend on symmetry and structure to communicate meaning. Consider the following

1. 朴树的最新专辑叫做“生如夏花”
Pǔ Shù de zuì xīn zhuānjí jiàozuò "shēng rú xià huā"
Pu Shu's latest album is called "Life like Summer Flowers"
2. 生活如六月的天气一样不可预测
Shēnghuó rú liù yuè de tiānqì yīyàng bùkěyùcè.
Life is like the weather in June - impossible to forecast.

How should you use the character 如? In most conversations 好像 is probably a better choice. Because 如 is a more classical character however, you will run into it fairly commonly in formal situations, or situations where your speaking partner wishes to come across as more educated. You will also run into it fairly frequently in written Chinese, so it pays to be aware of this meaning.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Ayis in China

The 阿姨 āyí is a cultural institution in China. In most major cities, the women (and it is almost always women) who work in the household service sector are drawn in from surrounding rural areas. In Shanghai, workers from Anhui and Fujian predominate, while in Beijing workers come mostly from Hebei and northeastern China.

Cleaning staff typically work odd hours and get paid hourly. In most cases, a maid may arrange to come over once or twice a week to help with everything from cleaning to cooking. Richer households will often hire a full-time maid who acts as something more akin to a nanny, and whose duties extend to cooking, running errands and taking care of the children. As the economy has grown, wages for workers in this sector have grown as well, and competition has driven up wages especially for workers who speak foreign languages like Korean.

GRAMMAR

The focus of this lesson is 万一 and 千万

万一 你被汽车或摩托车撞了，怎么办？

"On the off case you are hit by a motorcycle, what would you do?"

In this lesson we talk about the difference between “万一(wànyī)” and “千万(qiānwàn)”. Although may look similar to many learners, they are in fact quite different in meaning. Both phrases are adverbs. While wanyī is usually used to start a sentence, qianwan usually follows the subject of the sentence.

万一(wànyī) which means "in case of" or "in the unlikely event of," is usually combined with 怎么办(zěnme bàn) at the end of the sentence to form a common sentence pattern. In most cases, it can be replaced with 如果(rúguǒ) to express the speaker's concern over the consequence of something unlikely happening. Examples are:

1. 万一他不记得你，你怎么办？

wànyī tā bù jìde nǐ, nǐ zěnme

bàn?

In the rare case he doesn't remember you, what would you do?

2.

万一你出事了怎么办？

wànyī nǐ chūshì le zěnmē

bàn?

In case there is an accident, what would you do?

3. 万一你的摩托车被偷了怎么办？

wànyī nǐ de mótuōchē bèi tōu le zěnmē bàn?

What would you do if your motor bike is stolen?

千万 (qiānwàn), which means "whatever you do," is often used to stress something important or to give someone an order or suggestion. Consider the following examples:

1. 你千万别去。

Nǐ qiānwàn

biéqù.

Whatever you do, don't go.

2. 骑车千万要注意安全。

Qíchē qiānwàn yào zhùyì

ānquán.

When you ride in a bike, you should really pay attention to the safety.

3. 你千万别再忘戴头盔了。

Nǐ qiānwàn bié zài wàng dài tóukuī

le.

Whatever you do, don't forget to wear a helmet.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

China is well known for being the "kingdom of bicycles". However, in the last decade, strong economic development has enabled more and more Chinese people to replace the two-wheeled bicycles with the four-wheeled cars. Consequently, the roads in China are getting more and more crowded with cars, buses, motorbikes and bicycles all jammed up together -- which has naturally made riding bicycles in China one of the most dangerous experiences. In spite of these facts, you would find Chinese bicycle riders are amazingly skillful and brave, as nearly none of them rides with a helmet. Not only that, you can hardly find a bike shop that also sells helmets. When I was asking one of the shop assistants one day in Beijing, the answer was, "Hmm... Wait until it gets cold, maybe you'll find somewhere you can buy a helmet."

When it comes to the road safety in China, Chinese people are unusually brave. It's just like 90% of the Chinese drivers drive without the seat belts on. Literally none of the motorbike or bicycle riders wears helmets and the majority of pedestrians just cross the road anywhere they like and whenever they like. It all seems crazy when you first arrive in China. Then again, it only takes a couple of days before you get used to it and become just like the Chinese who live there.

你要么呆在家里，要么去上学。 Nǐ yàome dāi zài jiā lǐ, yàome qù shàngxué. You either stay at home or go to school.

GRAMMAR

The focus of this lesson is “要不...吧”(yàobu... ba) 要不要，你们今天晚上给它找只小母猫吧。

"Why don't you look for a female cat for it tonight?"

Today we are introduce the word 要不 yàobu (why not). This is a very colloquial way to make a suggestion. Place it at the start of your sentence. Because we are using this to make a suggestion, it is very natural to end our sentence with the auxiliary particle 吧 (ba) to form the grammar pattern 要不...吧 (yàobu... ba). This can be roughly translated as "how about" or "why not" in English. Notice the way that 要不 (yàobu) sentences have a soft connotation, almost as if the speaker is seeking agreement and approval from the listener. Here are two examples:

1. 要不你就待在家里，别去上班了吧？
Yàobu nǐ jiù dāi zài jiā lǐ, bié qù shàngbān le ba?
How about instead going to work, you stay at home?
2. 要不开我的车去吧？
Yàobu kāi wǒ de chē qù ba?
How about drive my car to go there ?

Many people get the 要不 construction confused with the 要么 yàome ("either") construction. These two words sound similar, but have radically different meanings in fact. Unlike 要不, 要么 is used in pairs to give the meaning "either...or...". It is also unlike 要不 in that it is extremely forceful. Rather than seeking consensus, 要么 forces the listener to make a choice between one of the two options presented. Considering the following examples:

1. 你要么待在家里，要么去上学。
Nǐ yàome dāi zài jiā lǐ, yàome qù shàngxué.
You can either stay at home, or go to school.
2. 你要么现在跟我回家，要么就永远也别回去了。
Nǐ yàome xiànzài gēn wǒ huíjiā, yàome jiù yǒngyuǎn yě bié huíqu le.
You are either going home with me right no, or not going back forever.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Chinese people love pets. At least in the last 10 years, the number of families that keeps pets (mainly dogs) has increased dramatically. While in the past the most common pets in Beijing were cats and birds, the popularity of dogs has increased radically lately. Another popular new pet in China is the turtle.

As pets have become more common, the number of veterinary clinics in China is on the increase too. Interestingly, if you walk into some of pet hospitals, you will find all sorts of pet-related services. These not only include medical services such as treating animal diseases, but also more cosmetic services like washing pets, clipping their nails and dressing them up. Some pet stores will even dye animals. Our staff have seen people walking dogs with fur dyed to make them resemble pandas.

The downside of this new trend is that the number of stray cats and dogs in Beijing has increased dramatically in recent years as well. Many of these pets are clearly formerly domesticated animals whose owners tired of the novelty and responsibility of caring for an animal and who let the pets loose in the city. Some also belonged to people who moved to new apartments where pets were not allowed. Around many apartment complexes you will find a number of stray cats who are cared for communally by the residents within. It is common to find food and water bowls in the bicycle yards provided for the neighborhood strays by well-meaning residents.

GRAMMAR

The focus of this lesson is “爱...(就)...” ài...(jiù)...

你爱买哪件买哪件。

Nǐ ài mǎi nǎ jiàn mǎi nǎ jiàn.

"Buy whichever you want."

Today we introduce a very colloquial pattern that will make you sound more native than native. As you know by now, 爱 (ài) literally means "to love". In this pattern we see it followed by a verb phrase which is repeated twice. In our dialogue, consider the sentence 你爱买哪件买哪件 nǐ ài mǎi nǎ jiàn mǎi nǎ jiàn ("But whichever one you like"). Our verb phrase here is the verb 买 (mǎi) followed by the question phrase 哪件 (nǎ jiàn). The whole sentence can be literally translated as "you love to buy whichever, buy whichever." Let's quickly consider some more examples:

1. 他爱干什么干什么，和我没关系。
Tā ài gàn shénme gàn shénme, hé wǒ méiguānxi.
He can do whatever he wants to do, it doesn't concern me.
2. 我爱吃什么吃什么，你别管。
Wǒ ài chī shénme chī shénme, nǐ biéguǎn.
I eat whatever I want to eat, it's none of your business.

If you use this pattern, be aware that you're signalling a degree of contempt or disregard for the matter at hand. This is not always rude, but be careful when you use this in formal situations. But if you really want to emphasize your disregard, you should feel free to place an extra 就 between your reduplicated action phrases, as with the following sentence:

1. 他爱说什么就说什么，别理他们。
Tā ài shuō shénme jiù shuō shénme, bié lǐ tāmen.
He can say whatever he wants to say, let's not be bothered.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Although this is rapidly changing in major urban cities like Beijing and Shanghai, most Chinese people don't purchasing clothing from large clothing stores with independent fitting rooms. Much more common are bazaar-style markets packed with hundreds of small shops, each of which sells into a particular niche. You can go to one small store to purchase jeans and pants, another for shoes and yet another for jackets and exterior wear. And because most of these stores are quite small, they almost never have fitting rooms. Instead, when you find an article of clothing you like, the salesperson will create a makeshift changing room by stringing up a cloth covering in a corner of their shop. This gives you the privacy to change, but not the privacy to take all day doing so.

While you might like to stick the to more expensive Westernized shops, remember that you might be missing out: it's possible to find some incredible bargains at traditional Chinese markets. In more than a few cases, factories contracted to product expensive clothing for export will produce more than their quota and then sell the remainder into mainland distribution channels at a significant markdown, but still a significant profit. That expensive sweater that cost more than three hundred dollars back home? Don't be surprised if you can find it for a tenth of the price in China. Still expensive compared to some of the other pieces of clothing on sale, but a bargain nonetheless.

GRAMMAR

The focus of this lesson is the use of "那是" nà shì

那是，总统套房。

Nà shì, zǒngtǒng tài fáng.

"Of course, it's the presidential suite."

In this lesson we introduce a very useful phrase that is often used in spoken language. Most of you are already familiar with "当然" meaning "of course" as in the dialogue "当然，五星级，都是进口的。" Dāngrán, wǔ xīng jí, dōu shì jìnkǒu de. There is another phrase "那是" sharing more or less the same meaning as "当然". In spoken language, "那是" perhaps sounds a bit more casually than "当然" with a higher degree of emphasis and a sense of being proud of what is going to be said. As in the dialogue "那是，总统套房。" Note that the emphasis should be on "那" when you speak in order to stress the reason why the room is so big is because it is a presidential suite.

1 你的女朋友长得真漂亮。

那是！当模特的。

Nǐ de nǚpéngyou zhǎng de zhēn piàoliang.

Nà shì! Dàng móte de.

Your girlfriend is really pretty.

Of course, (she is) a model.

2 你这电脑挺好用的。

那是！进口的。

Nǐ zhè diànnǎo tǐng hǎo yòng de.

Nà shì! jìnkǒu de.

Your computer is pretty easy to use.

Of course, it's imported.

Another way of saying "那是" with no obvious emphasis on the first character "那" shows that the speaker is in agreement with the other person who is possibly in a superior position. Sometimes it can be repeated twice "那是那是" which can roughly translated as "that's right...". Such as the examples below:

1 那是那是，顾客就是我们的上帝。

Nà shì nà shì, gùkè jiùshì wǒmen de shàngdì.

That's right, the customers are god to us.

2 那是那是，老婆是最聪明的。

nà shì nà shì, lǎopo shì zuì cōngmíng de.

That's right, wife is the cleverest one.

There is one last scenario where sometimes "那是" leading a whole sentence. In these cases, of course "那是" doesn't carry the meaning "of course". It usually can be translated as its literal meaning "that is ...".

1 那是去年的事儿了。

Nà shì qùnián de shìr le.

That is something happened last year.

2 那是因为你还不习惯这儿的天气。

Nà shì yīnwèi nǐ huán bù xíguàn zhèr de tiānqì.

That is because you are yet to get used to the weather here.

CULTURAL INSIGHT

China is a country filled with contradictions: the communist country that is filled with capitalists, more billionaires than anywhere else in the world and yet poverty abounds and the immense pride in 5000 years of culture where the past is being pulled down everyday.

Appearances can be deceiving. I recently attended my friend's wedding in the up and coming provincial capital Hohhot in Inner Mongolia. On the journey from the airport, I was amazed by array of towering buildings and bright lights. We stayed in a new development area filled with brand new luxurious apartments. Our hotel room looked amazing as we entered it with plush carpets, a huge flat screen TV, a full leather luxury suite.

However, upon closer inspection, I noticed that there was no toilet paper, no room service, the TV wasn't working, the power cut out intermittently and the electric wires were hanging from the walls in places.

This often seems to be the case in modern China. In the rush to develop and build hugely impressive edifices, corners are often cut and small details are ignored. The new Hohhot ring road our taxi drove down was as modern as any first world country. However, bicycles on the cycle lane were dodging an open sewer hole with no 'Danger' sign or warning to passing cyclists or pedestrians. All too often this is the case in China so be warned not to spend all your time looking up at the soaring buildings in case you end up falling into a hole.

GRAMMAR

Our focus in this lesson is the particle "的".
这年头儿没听说还有占座的。

Zhè niántóu ér méi tīngshuō hái yǒu zhàn zuò de.

This being the intermediate level, we're sure you're already somewhat familiar with the particle 的 (de). As we've taught in previous levels, the most common function of 的 is to signal a subordinate relationship between two nouns or phrases, to signal that the latter is subordinate to the former. This is can be used to signal possessive relations or to suggest that an object belongs to a certain (and often abstract) class of items.

One of the more confusing uses of 的 occurs when it shows up at the end of a sentence. Even advanced students often find themselves confused in this case. Which is why we focus on two common usages of 的 which tend to exhibit this behavior. The first usage is the emphatic 是... 的 pattern that we have covered before. The second common pattern occurs in our dialogue for today. Together with 占座, this forms a noun phrase which is the object of the sentence. The character 的 is still being used as a subordinating particle. In this case the object which is subordinated to the action has been omitted. In this case the omitted noun is 人 or person. Take a look at the following examples:

1. 教法语的是个新来的老师。

Jiāo fǎyǔ de shì ge xīnláide lǎoshī.

"The one who teaches French is a new teacher."

2. 今晚酒吧里来了好多学跳舞的。

Jīnwǎn jiǔbā lǐ lái le hǎo duō xué tiàowǔ de.

"There are many people who came to the bar to learn dancing tonight."

3. 这儿有没有会开车的？

Zhèr yǒu méiyǒu huì kāichē de?

"Is there anyone who can drive?"

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Subway battles aren't common, but this dialogue was actually inspired by something our team witnessed a few days ago on the Beijing subway. The leading roles in that case were played by two seemingly civilized young ladies. As with our dialogue, the fight was over whether it was proper to save a seat for a friend in a crowded subway.

Speaking of subways, be sure to check out the Beijing transit system the next time you're in town. Only eight years ago there were a mere two lines in service. At time of writing, this has expanded to nine lines, with more under construction. Considered in terms of length, there are now more than two hundred kilometers of track in Beijing sprawled out across the nine city lines. Although much of the heavy development occurred in the years before the Beijing Olympics, development continues rapidly. According the Beijing city planning office, Beijing will more than double its total amount of subway lines by 2015.

GRAMMAR

The Focus of This Lesson is 有的是 (yǒudeshì)

我有的是钱！wǒ yǒudeshì qián!

"I have plenty of money!"

For today's grammar point, we introduce how to say, "having a lot of something," in a rather colloquial way. So far, you should be familiar with 很多, 许多, and 好多, all of which mean "a lot of/plenty of." Here, taking the sentence from the dialogue, 我有的是钱! (Wǒ yǒudeshì qián!) is the same meaning as 我有很多钱 (wǒ yǒu hěn duō qián). Therefore, 有的是 here has nothing to do with the literal meaning of the three characters. As mentioned before, this is a rather casual way of saying, "I have plenty of money." Note when someone says it, the emphasis would be on the character 是 and it shows that the speaker is rather boasting about the fact that someone has got a lot of something.

For Example:

1. 他有的是力气。
Tā yǒudeshì lìqi.
"He has plenty of strength."
2. 房价这么贵，买不起房子的人有的是。
Fángjià zhème guì, mǎibùqǐ fángzi de rén yǒudeshì.
"The housing price is so expensive, (no wonder) there are plenty of people who can't afford to buy a house."
3. 他工作很久了，有的是经验。
Tā gōngzuò hěn jiǔ le, yǒudeshì jīngyàn.
"He's worked for a long time and has a lot of experience."
4. 这儿还有的是复印纸，随使用吧。
Zhèr hái yǒudeshì fùyìn zhǐ, suíbiàn yòng ba.
"There are still plenty of printing paper, help yourself!"

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Cramming for a Full

I went to visit an old friend at her house last year. As soon as I got into the door, my friend urged their nine-year-old boy to greet me in English. "He needs more practice. We've been taking him to this oral English class ran by an American guy since he was six years old. We think he is getting better and better." After I sat down, the parents asked the quiet boy, "Why don't you show Auntie your new toy?" Near where they were pointing, I spotted a shiny drum kit. The parents proudly told me that this was his birthday present from last year and he's been studying to play the drums. "He really likes it!" they added as they both turned to the boy eagerly. The boy gave a shy smile. A couple of days later, I ran into my friend again downstairs in a shopping mall on a Saturday afternoon. I was surprised to see that she had finally got some time on her own when she started to complain to me, "I have to wait for five hours-the whole afternoon-for my son while he is going to the math cram school. It's so boring here and I am so tired." I don't know whether I should have had more sympathy for the young mum waiting hand on foot for her child or the nine-year-old little boy with extra classes taking up all his free time.

Unfortunately, I have many friends whose families are more or less like this. The parents' spare time completely revolves around the only child's busy life and learning schedule.

"Your flight CA9507 to Alaska will be delayed because of the mechanical difficulties."

We devote today's grammar point to a collection of airport and on flight announcements you would often hear in China. In fact, it is not very difficult to understand the announcements once you became familiar with the airport vocabulary since the grammar involved is fairly simple and straight-forward. There are a few of them you would hear at the airport and on the plane.

For Example:

1. 乘客您好，您乘坐的国航CA9507次飞往Alaska的航班因飞机故障要延迟起飞。

*Chéngkènnínhǎo, nín chéngzuò de guóháng CA9507cì fēiwǎng xxxxde hángbān yīn fēijī

"Attention passengers, your flight CA9507 to Alaska will be delayed because of the fog."

2. 乘客您好，您乘坐的国航CA9507次飞往Alaska的航班已经开始登机了。请您前往xx号登机口办理登机。

*Chéngkènnínhǎo, nín chéngzuò de guóháng CA9507cì fēiwǎng Alaskade hángbān yǐjīng

"Attention passengers, your flight CA9607 to Alaska has now started boarding. Please proceed to the boarding gate No. xx for boarding."

3. 本次航班就要起飞了，请你系好安全带，收起小桌板，将座椅调直。

Běncì hángbān jiù yào qǐfēi le, qǐng nǐ jì hǎo ānquándài, shōuqǐxiǎozhuōbǎn, jiāng zuòyǐ tiáozhí.

"The flight is about to take off soon. Please fasten your seat belt, remove your tray table, and adjust your seat to upright position."

4. 飞机现在遇到气流，会有些颠簸。请您在座位上系好安全带。

Fēijī xiànzài yù dào qìliú, huì yǒuxiē diānbǒ. Qǐng nín zài zuòwèi shàng jì hǎo ānquándài.

"We are experiencing some turbulence. Please remain in your seat and fasten your seat belt."

5. 本次航班将会于十分钟后到达北京首都国际机场，请您关闭所有电子设备。

"We're going to land at the Beijing international airport in ten minutes, please switch off all your electronic devices."

CULTURAL INSIGHT

Chinese Airport Woes

Before the grand new Beijing airport terminal three was formally opened in 2008 the Beijing airport was on the list of the ten most hated places in Beijing (well my list at least), especially when it came to domestic flights. In recent years, the competition for the domestic airline market has been getting more and more fierce. The number of airline companies has increased from the original three or four dominating ones to twenty or so offering discounted tickets cheaper than the same destination bound train tickets. However, along with the cheaper airline tickets comes the low reliability of the airlines with planes frequently being delayed or even cancelled. An extreme case happened to a friend of mine who had to wait for plane to take off by sitting on the plane for almost ten hours before being asked to get off and come back the next day for a domestic flight. This situation has more or less changed for the better in the last couple of years. Nevertheless, for those of you who are going to brave the domestic Chinese airlines someday, please allow yourself plenty of spare time for traveling.

Another interesting thing about airports in China is the restaurants at the airport. During a national holiday I flew to Hohhot, the capital city of inner Mongolia. While waiting for boarding, I wandered into the only café-style restaurant after receiving the warmest greeting from the girls at the door. Upon realizing a simple Latte coffee would cost 68rmb (about ten dollars), I politely backed my way out. So another piece of advice for you, please check the price for any service at the airport in China before ordering.

GRAMMAR

The focus of this lesson is ...不然...(bùrán...)

请你配合一下，不然您是登不了机的。

Qǐng nǐ pèihéyíxià, bùrán nín shì dēng bù liǎo jī de.

"Please be cooperate, otherwise you can't board the plane."

Today we are introducing a very useful and important sentence pattern ...不然...(bùrán ...), which can be roughly translated as "...otherwise..." 不然 (bùrán) is used as a transitional conjunction word to combine two separate sentences. If what has been said in the first sentence does not happen, the result will be followed in the second sentence. As the sentence from our dialogue, if the passenger does not comply with the security check officer, she will not be able to get onboard. Sometimes 要不然 (yàoburán) or 要不 (yàobu) can replace 不然 (bùrán) in the middle of the sentence with the same function.

For Example:

1. 你最好快点儿走，不然你会迟到的。

Nǐ zuì hǎo kuài diǎnr zǒu, bùrán nǐ huì chídào de.

"You'd better hurry up, otherwise you will be late."

2. 明天我还有别的事儿，要不然我肯定陪你去。

Míngtiān wǒ hái yǒubiéde shìr, yàoburán wǒ kěndìng péi nǐ qù.

"I've got something else to do tomorrow, otherwise I will go with you for sure."

3. 我实在没钱了，要不我还能不给你买。

Wǒ shízài méi qiánle, yàobu wǒ zhǔn gěi nǐ mǎi.

"I am really out of money, otherwise for sure I will buy it for you."

Same with 要不然 (yàoburán) and 要不 (yàobu), if you remember when 不然 (bùrán) is used at the beginning of a sentence, it usually means the speaker is trying to give some sort of suggestions or asking for other's opinions meaning, "how about...".

For Example:

1. 不然我去吧。

Bùrán wǒ qù ba.

"How about let me go."

2. 要不我给你买吧。

Yàobu wǒ gěi nǐ mǎi ba.

"How about let me buy it for you."

不然 (burán) has another meaning when it is not used as a transitional conjunction word. For example, 他觉得他做对了, 其实不然。 (Tā juéde tā zuò duìle, qíshí bùrán). Here 不然 (burán) means, 不是这样的 (bù shì zhè yàng de).

CULTURAL INSIGHT

One of the more unusual features in Chinese airports is the "instant feedback" button usually found just below the counter at the immigration desk and other parts of the airports. While the immigration officer is busy scrutinizing your fuzzy old passport picture, you can choose to evaluate their efficiency by pressing either the 'very satisfied', 'satisfied' or 'unsatisfied' buttons which will begin to flash as soon as you get there. While the proximity of the officer might make it a bit uncomfortable to be too critical, it is hard to know how they use the data they collect. Do they get a bonus for lots of satisfied? Do they get extra training for an unsatisfied? Or is the pressing of the button the end of the process? I would love to know.
